

GALLIGAN'S SUICIDE.

ONCE A WELL-KNOWN STATE LEAGUE BALL PLAYER.

James M. Galligan, aged 36, of New York city, formerly of Easton, at one time a well-known base ball player, committed suicide in the bath room of No. 225 Central Park West, by cutting his throat with a razor. He lived with his sister and her husband, Edward Van Pelt, a silk broker.

Galligan was married, but two years ago he and his wife separated, causing great despondency on Galligan's part. Kidney trouble also affected him badly, and seven weeks ago he went to Roosevelt Hospital. He remained there three weeks.

Two days ago Galligan again showed signs of despondency. He did not mention what had caused it this time, but took to his room and did not leave it at all.

He gave up base ball playing six or seven years ago and was since employed as a clerk in a downtown office in New York. His relatives noticed that he was never the same since he quit the diamond.

Clipped By:

rcbuffington

Sat, Oct 24, 2015